Recycling Plan Urgently Needed for Tens of Thousands of Wind Turbine Blades

By Steve Milne for Epoch Times

Tens of thousands of wind turbine blades will end up in landfill by 2030 unless recycling programs are promptly established, research from the University of South Australia has shown.

Led by Professor Peter Majewski, the study lays bare the challenges of recycling wind turbine blades, which have an average lifespan of about 25 years and whose current construction from either carbon fibre or fibreglass composite material makes them expensive to break down, with the leftover materials having little market value.

“The same features that make these blades cost-effective and reliable for use in commercial wind turbines make them very difficult to recycle in a cost-effective fashion,” Majewski said in a release on Thursday.

“As it is so expensive to recycle them, and the recovered materials are worth so little, it is not realistic to expect a market-based recycling solution to emerge, so policymakers need to step in now and plan what we’re going to do with all these blades that will come offline in the next few years.”

With over 40 million tonnes of blade waste expected worldwide by 2050, alternative solutions to landfill are urgently needed, and while in Europe blades have been repurposed to be used for playgrounds, street furniture, bicycle shelters and walkways, the Clean Energy Council of Australia stresses this can only play a minor role over time in reducing the need for blade recycling solutions.

Producer Responsibility and Official Regulation Frameworks

Majewski said the cost of disposing of the blades sustainably will probably need to be factored into the cost of their manufacture or alternatively the cost of their operation.

“So, drawing on the experience of similar programs for other products, either the manufacturer must take responsibility for what needs to be done with the blades at the end of their useful life, or the wind farm operators must provide end-of-life solutions as part of the planning approval process for their business operations,” he said.

Majewski highlighted that in addition to self-regulation, the long lifespan and high cost of blades means official frameworks are necessary to ensure transition of responsibility.

“If manufacturers disappear, or wind farms go broke, we need to ensure processes are still in place for the turbine blades to be disposed of properly,” he said.

While it is likely consumers will be hit with some of the end-of-life cost via energy tariffs, Majewski believes market competition between energy producers will minimise that impact.

“There will be some cost to this for everyone involved, but we have to accept that as part of the cost of producing energy in this way,” he said.

“Without such solutions, energy options like wind and solar may prove to be no more sustainable than the old technologies they are aiming to replace.”

First Recyclable Wind Turbine Blades Developed in Denmark

In September 2021, renewable energy company Siemens Gamesa developed what they call “the world's first wind turbine blade that can be recycled at the end of its lifecycle”.

The new blades, developed at the company's Denmark factory, are constructed from a combination of materials cast together using resin, resulting in a strong and flexible lightweight structure.

The chemical structure of this particular resin means it can be efficiently separated from the other components of the blade at the end of its life, and this process protects the properties of the blade materials, something not achievable in the recycling of conventional blades. The breakdown materials can then be reused in other applications.

Siemens Gamesa says offshore customers will now have the opportunity to choose these new recyclable blades for their future projects.

Man is man and woman is woman

JUNE 30 Posted by Editor, cairnsnews

Letter to the Editor from Gil May, Forestdale Qld

Some appear to have difficulty in defining a woman, why— It is very simple.

A WOMAN: a member of the Homo sapiens species having two XX chromosomes, which allows development of a body capable of reproduction of the species.

A MAN: a member of the Homo sapiens species having one X and one Y chromosome, which allows development of a body larger than a female with more muscle and bone structure and the ability for internal fertilize a female egg allowing her to reproduce the species.

A HUMAN: a creature defined into two sexes either having two XX or one X and one Y chromosomes. Each sex will develop specific hormones that permit developmental shape and organs for procreation.

The one having two XX chromosomes produce specific hormones to develop a procreative body for reproductive development and mammary glands that secrete nourishment for the reproduced offspring.

The other one having one X and one Y chromosomes produce specific hormones to develop large heavier bone and muscular structure for protection and food provisions of their family.

The chromosome structure is permanent, alteration of body appearances and its usage may allow pseudo role reversal and role playing, but not reproduction.

Israel Expands Abortion Access After US Overturns Roe v Wade

JERUSALEM, Israel – Israel on Monday loosened its restrictions on abortion just days after the United States Supreme Court decided to overturn Roe v. Wade.

A parliamentary committee approved the changes aimed at making it easier for Israeli women to obtain abortions. The new rules will make abortion pills more widely available through the country's universal healthcare system. Now, Israeli women will be able to get abortion pills from their local health clinics instead of just hospitals. Additionally, the rules remove a long-standing requirement that women physically appear before a special committee to request permission for an abortion.

The changes will go into effect in three months.

"The rights to a woman's body are those of the woman alone," said Health Minister Nitzan Horowitz in the statement announcing the changes.

"The move by the US Supreme Court to deny women control of their bodies is a backward move, oppressing women and setting back the leader of the free and liberal world by a hundred years," he said. "We are in a different place, and today we are taking big steps in the right direction."

Bead Chaim, an Israeli pro-life organization is disappointed by the decision and recently joined a petition asking Israel's High Court to ban abortion after the 24th week.

"We recognize the 24-week-old fetus (baby) as a person who can survive out of the womb – viable human being," Be'ad Chaim's director, Sandy Shoshani, told CBN News. "In Israel, they will save a baby only from 24 weeks and not before."

Israel's High Court is expected to rule on the petition in mid-July.

Abortion is widely available in Israel and the issue is far less controversial in the Jewish state than it is in the US.

An estimated one in five pregnancies are terminated each year, with the government funding most abortion procedures.
